The mate and the engineer became alarmed, and, fearing that she was about to sink, set her syphon at work. According to resultations on the synhol's conregulations one section of the syphon's con-nections enters the hold and the other the river, the former being a protection against sinking and the latter against fire. In his haste the engineer opened the valve of the river connection, and the syphon worked away for dear life. In the meantime the coal was shifted and the boat trimmed so that no more water could enter the hold. The that no more water could enter the hold. The anxious officers watched the stream of water thrown out by the syphon for full two hours, and were not a little worried because the water in the hold failed to show any dimi nution. In this dilemma Captain Norwood McClellan was hurriedly summoned, and that gentleman, who is a practical engineer, immediately discovered where the trouble lay. The mistake was remedied and in a few mioutes the bont was free from water. When Captain Kranz learned what was the matter, he just threw up his hands and shouted: 'Mine Got! das engineer fellow will pump der Mississippi river dry before I gets to New Orleans.'" Dangerous Borning-Fluid Regulations.
